

Electric percussion instruments

Abstract

An electric percussion instrument contains an electrically charged or chargeable vibrating surface. When the instrument is played, the vibrating surface emits sound directly. It also creates electromagnetic disturbances that can be detected using appropriate electronic devices, thus enabling the instrument to produce signals describing the instrument's sound along with the sound itself.